What To Do To Help:

- Always take any indication of suicidal feelings seriously, no matter how casually they may be conveyed.
- Ask them about their feelings
- Specifically ask if they are feeling suicidal
- Don't judge them and tell them what they should/shouldn't do.
- Allow them to open up to you and share their feelings knowing that you are understanding what they are going through (even if you don't completely or don't agree with how they feel).
- In a private place, let them express the pain that they have been suppressing inside of them.
- Assess their Risk while they are talking. Listen to see what their thoughts are. Do they know when they are going to do it? How? Where? Do they have the means to carry their plan out (ex. access to weapons, prescription drugs, etc.)?
- If the individual has a plan thought out and you know they have access to the means to carry it out, they are at a very high risk and 9-1-1 should be contacted to get them immediate help.
- Let them know you care about them and want to get help together.
- Don't promise to keep this a secret. Other people need to know.
- It's not your job to fix their life, but you can get them in contact with appropriate resources who can help them.
- Anyone who is suicidal needs the support of a counsellor or mental health professional. This provides them with the opportunity to learn new life strategies to cope with their stresses and pain.
- Local distress lines are a great resource because they are professionals available 24/7.
- It is our responsibility to respond to the signs that we see. We need to provide the chance for that person to make a more healthy choice.
